Chinatown, or Yaowarat as it is known locally, is a sprawling neon-lit enclave of tiny lanes, fabulous food, dramatic Chinese shrines and wiry old men sitting on plastic stools staring through thick-rimmed glasses. It's a fantastic place just to wander around during the day, stuffing your face with weird fried things and try to figure out just what is being displayed in the Chinese pharmacy windows. Yaowarat Road itself, Chinatown's main stretch, comes alive at night when fold-up-table restaurants spill out over the pavements, and a million and one gold shops, with their ridiculously ostentatious facades, flick on their neon switches. It's quite a sight. Here you will find one of the most imposing temples in Bangkok, Wat Traimit Witthayaram and the world's largest solid gold Buddha. Weighing over five tons and standing over three meters high, it's worth has been estimated at over US$10 million. And, 50m further on, the Odeon Circle Gate, an enormous structure that serves as the entrance to Chinatown proper.

Continue on and mumble "Pak Khlong Talad" to explore the 24-hour flower market. From dusk till dawn, Pak Khlong Talad fills city streets with the floral perfume of a thousand blooms. By the river vendors prepare fresh bouquets of lilies, orchids, and roses, and everything that could possibly blossom. Ready your nose, this is a place that will take your sense of smell away!

Witness an amazing railway market where you will see the vendors frantically packing away their stalls as the train approaches, and then once your train has gone through, the vendors setting up their stalls once again on the tracks. Then continue on

Here, the canals are filled with small flat boats loaded with fruit, vegetables and other goodies for sale. Expertly paddled by mature ladies, the boats jockey for position when prospective buyers arrive on the boardwalks, ready to stop and bargain at a moment's notice. A boat ride along the canal, which is both exhilarating and fascinating, takes you to the market. The traditional long-tail boat allows an interesting glimpse into local life, orchards, traditional teak houses, floating water hyacinths, snapshots of local people by the river and more. This colorful market environment is guaranteed to be great fun. And don't forget to buy something!

The grounds of Ancient City correspond roughly to the shape of the kingdom, with each of the monuments lying at their correct places geographically. Some of the buildings are life-size replicas of existing or former sites, while others are scaled down. The replicas were constructed with the assistance of experts from the National Museum to ensure historical accuracy. Outstanding works include the former Grand Palace of Ayutthaya (destroyed in the Burmese invasion of 1767), Phimai Sanctuary in Nakhon Ratchasima, and Wat Khao Phra Viharn on the Cambodian border. One of the things to do in Bangkok is visit the home of Jim Thompson, the American businessman largely responsible for the global popularity of hand-woven Thai silk. Jim Thompson is best known today as a "brand" of luxury Thai fabric, but the man himself has a fascinating story. An American entrepreneur, he arrived in Bangkok in the 1940s and almost single-handedly revived the Thai silk industry. His disappearance in the Cameron Highlands in Malaysia almost 25 years later remains a mystery, but he is remembered in Bangkok in his distinctive home. The House is a complex of six traditional Thai-style teakwood houses, each of which he bought from owners around the country and transported to his Bangkok property. He connected them with covered walkways and proceeded to furnish them with an exceptional collection of south-east Asian antiques. Both the site and his personal story are diverting.

This easy day trip gives a superb introduction to the architectural heritage of the ancient capital Ayutthaya. Ayutthaya is filled with palaces, temples and religious monuments of great historical and cultural significance – even in their ruined state. Ayutthaya was one of the richest cities in SE Asia during its heyday, but after it was attacked by the Burmese in 1767, most of the city was destroyed, and the ruins left to be over-taken by nature. However, over the past 30 years the remnants of the city have been renovated into a UNESCO historical park, which, at 85kms from Bangkok, makes an ideal daytrip from the city.

The tour begins with a guided stroll around the splendid Bang Pa-In Summer Palace and its landscaped gardens, peppered with curious buildings that blends turn-of-the-century European architectural styles with Thai and Chinese styles. Continue on to Ayutthaya Historical Park, and explore the temple ruins. Visit other temples
